C (sɪ), the third letter of the Roman alphaphbet, was orig. identical with the Greek Gam- ma, Γ, and Semitic Gimel, whence its form.
In earlier Latin, it functioned both as (g) and (k); but subseq. it stood for the (k) sound only.
When the Roman alphabet was introduced o B n C ad on y he sou d) T e p esen va e of C he es of de opmen s he ook pa e bo h n B an nd on he continent during the time covered by the OE and ME. periods. (See N.E.D.)

In mod. English, C has (1) the 'hard' sound (k) bef. a, o, u, bef. a cons. (exc. h), and when final, (2) bef. e, i, y it has the soft sound (s).
In all words from OE. and OF., final c is avoided: the (k) sound being written k, or c as in beak, book, etc. Final c however is written in mod. words from Latin, Greek, or other langs., and (of late) in the ending -ic, as in sac- erice, cratie, etc. But where this c is followed in inflexion by e or i, it is changed to ck, as in physick, pic-nicker, etc. When the (s) sound is final, it must be written -ce, as in trace, ice, etc., and this final c is retained in composition bef. a, o, u, as in trace-able etc. (3) C (rarely ce) preceding another vowel has frequently the sound of (j), esp. in the endings -cious, -cual -cure, as avicious, etc. This sound (which is also taken by i in the same position) is comparatively modern.

In foreign words, c oceans. retains the foreign pronunciation, as in Il. caccrone (i[st]ardne).

C springs; see CEE (spring). C chief; see CLEF.

II. Used to denote serial order with the value of 'third', as quire C. spec. a. In Musical: The key-note of the 'natural' major scale. Also, the scale which has that note for its tonic. b. In astronomy, law, etc. Any third person or thing. C; the lowest grade of physical fitness for military service, hence fig.

III. Abbreviations. 1. C now rarely c = L. centum written lxx, etc. Also, formerly = cwt. 2. Mus. 'A'
